When you begin working with Photoshop, one of the first things you'll want to do is to create an image that demonstrates at least one version of a characteristic that you're trying to understand. An image that's less than a good example of a particular process may be confusing to you if you want to accurately convey an idea and practice it yourself. You can use any image-editing software to create samples of your work in the form of JPEGs. The program you use will make no difference, so you don't need to worry about which tools you use. Just be sure that the image you create in your image-editing program can be easily transferred to Photoshop because you're using it as a reference in Photoshop. You can do that by using the Photoshop file formats: PSD or TIFF. You may also want to consider creating a `.tiff` (Tagged Image File Format) file of the sample. This file format can include layers and can be shared with other image-editing programs. You can use it to create and share similar samples or `.tiff` versions of your own images to share with your fellow students or colleagues. As you work with Photoshop, you may find it helpful to use the `Organizer` tool as a means of organizing your images. Organizing your work helps you to find images quickly when you need to. You can assign categories or keywords to images. You can even create sets of similar images that you store in groups or folders. This helps you find the images you need when you need them. *** # TIP When you save images to your computer, you can have the system make a backup copy of your image files. An important part of learning how to use Photoshop is taking advantage of these backups. Doing so saves your work in case your computer crashes or if your hard drive becomes damaged. You can make a copy of the file either before you save it or before you export it. You can set your file settings to be fairly easy to configure. You

Q: Is it possible to determine the amount of juice left in a squeezer? I've had a chance to check out a few different juice squeezers in my area (I'm in the U.S.), and they all seem to have a spout in the lid, either directly into the cup or to an indentation (like a plastic straw). I'm pretty confident that all of these are juice squeezers. However, the colors of the juice that's expelled (and thus is in the cup) differ significantly, so I can't really tell which type of squeezer a given commercial brand is, nor can I tell if they have different specifications like metal versus plastic, spouts versus indentations. Since I'm having trouble figuring out what kind of juice squeezers I can buy, I was wondering if anyone has ever determined how much juice is left in a juice squeezer by using some kind of scientific method? That is, I have a squeezer and I estimate the amount of liquid left, then I measure that amount, so I can calculate the percentage left. A: To answer this question properly, you have to have proper equipment. You may be able to measure the "yield" of a given machine, and calculate how many cups you are making, but I don't know if you have a good measurement device to calibrate with. A few devices will do the job, but a flow meter is the only real option. It won't work with a glass bottle unless you seal it with a vacuum pump. Once you have this flow meter, you can use the calibration to work up a recipe to convert to cups/oz. That will give you the juice yield of the machine, but you still have to use an accurate way to measure cups/oz. You can then use the yield number, and the manufacturer's conversions to find out how many cups/oz are actually produced by the machine. For example, the KitchenAid manual says: Yield: When you measure your yield, you want to be sure to use the same method every time. Measuring cups ensure that you will measure accurately. Use the other liquids from the same package to get a reading: Just pour the juice straight into a glass and measure. (Source: KitchenAid) But, apparently, their recipe is as follows: 3.2 cup - use 1/2 cup water and 1/3 cup

Share it! There are certain times of the year that people become more concerned about getting their hair to look its best. We have just completed our spring summer fashion campaign and believe it is time to look into the importance of how you care for your hair. Hair is naturally dry and has a daily demand for moisture. We have more resources, means and ways to meet this demand. While there are more natural ways to moisturize the hair and prevent damage, there are also "conventional" ways to do so as well. Before there were available conditioners for all the different kinds of hair and different kinds of issues you may have, shampoos were the first thing you may have used to cleanse your hair. Oftentimes the solution was alcohol. After a day of constantly washing your hair, the last thing you need to do is drag in more alcohol. However, conditioners are much better and can help return your hair to its original state as well as giving it the hydration it needs. Wet hair tends to look shinier, have better body and definition. Most conditioners use a mixture of ingredients that make your hair look shinier, have more definition, are easier to comb and even are easier to dry. Some of the great conditioners out there today also add antioxidants to really help maintain your hair. For people with curly or thin hair, the same process may apply. In fact, one of the most popular products on the market today is the Keratin Transformer. It helps strengthen the weak keratin and give you the best texture possible. The best way to care for your hair is to be very informed about what you use. Many people believe that the more they use a product, the better it is for their hair. However, it is also very important to understand what you are putting on your hair. The best way to go about it is to find a good source that will answer all your questions and show you the proper way to apply a product. This will ensure that you are putting everything into your hair, keeping it clean and well hydrated, and giving it the correct protection it needs. That being said, there are a variety of products and products that are best for a variety of situations. There are products on the market that may not work as well when trying to achieve one goal, for instance, if you are looking to get as much conditioning out of your hair as possible, there are products that may
